

TITLE: "THE GENIE'S CONTRACT – A LESSON IN LOVE AND LOSS"

PREPARED BY: MulltiHub

THE STORY :

Once upon a time, there was an old man. He was weak, sick, and broken. His health was failing, and his days were numbered. He had once been a rich and respected businessman, but now he was completely bankrupt. All his money was gone. His company was destroyed. His friends had left him. He had nothing left except a dusty old house and a heavy heart.

He had one daughter. She was young, beautiful, and full of dreams. But she was also proud, selfish, and cold. She only cared about money, status, and luxury. She never asked her father how he felt. She only asked how much he would leave her when he died. That broke the old man's heart even more than his sickness.

One dark night, while searching through his late mother's belongings, he found a strange golden lamp hidden under old clothes. It was covered in dust and cobwebs, but it still shone faintly in the moonlight. Curious, he rubbed it with his shaking hands.

Suddenly, the room exploded with bright blue light. A powerful gust of wind blew through the windows. The ground trembled like an earthquake. And then, a giant figure appeared from the smoke. It was the King of Genies — a magnificent being who had been trapped inside the lamp for more than a thousand years. His eyes burned like fire. His voice echoed like thunder. But his heart was gentle and kind.

He bowed to the old man and said, "You have freed me from my prison. I am forever grateful. Ask me for anything, and I shall grant your wish."

The old man did not ask for gold, jewels, or palaces. He did not ask for health or power. He only asked for one thing: "Please marry my daughter. Protect her. Give her a good life. That is my only wish."

The Genie agreed, because he respected the old man's pure love.

But when the daughter heard this, she was furious. She shouted at her father. She screamed at the Genie. She did not want to marry a magical creature. She thought he was strange, old-fashioned, and not worthy of her beauty. She only cared about her freedom and her future wealth.

So she made a cold, selfish deal. She looked the Genie straight in the eyes and said, "I will marry you, but only for three years. After that, I will leave you. I will take all the money you earn for me, and I will walk away forever. You cannot stop me.”

The Genie felt a sharp pain in his chest. He had waited a thousand years for freedom — and now he was being treated like a servant. But he had given his word to her father. So he nodded silently and said, “Three years. I accept.”

For the next three years, the Genie kept every single promise. He gave her unimaginable luxury. He bought her palaces made of marble and gold. He dressed her in the finest silk and diamonds. He served her breakfast on silver plates. He took her to breathtaking islands, snowy mountains, and golden deserts — all in the blink of an eye. He turned her father's failed company into a giant empire. Her name became famous everywhere. She was invited to the most exclusive parties. She was respected by the richest people in the world.

But she never appreciated any of it.

She never said thank you. She never smiled at him. She never asked about his feelings. Instead, she treated him like a worthless slave. She made him clean her shoes. She made him carry her shopping bags. She gave him orders like he was a dog. She screamed at him for small mistakes. She mocked him in front of her friends and called him old and useless.

The Genie's heart was shattered. But he stayed silent. He kept hoping that one day, she would change. He kept loving her, even though she gave him nothing in return. He thought that maybe — just maybe — his patience would melt her icy heart.

But he was wrong.

One sunny afternoon, the Genie returned home early. He had finished her business work and wanted to surprise her with a beautiful gift. But when he reached the garden, he froze.

She was sitting under a big shady tree with another man. A young, handsome man with no job, no money, and no future. She was laughing with him. She was holding his hand. She was looking at him with tender eyes — the kind of eyes she had never given to the Genie.

The Genie's world collapsed in that single moment. His thousand-year-old heart cracked into a million pieces. He felt like he had been stabbed by a thousand knives. He had given her everything — his time, his power, his wealth, his love — and she had betrayed him without any guilt.

But he did not scream. He did not cry. He did not beg. He simply turned around and disappeared into the shadows. He decided to wait. He was a king, and kings do not crawl. He had made a contract, and he would respect it till the very last second.

He waited patiently for the three years to end. He counted every day, every hour, every minute. He continued to serve her, protect her, and spoil her — even though his heart was bleeding. But she didn't even notice his pain. She was too busy enjoying her secret romance.

Finally, the last day arrived. At exactly midnight, when the clock struck twelve, the Genie stood before her. His face was calm, but his eyes were full of sadness. He looked at her one last time and said:

“Our contract is complete. Three years are over. I gave you everything I had — my power, my loyalty, my heart. But you gave me nothing but disrespect. Now I am leaving. Forever.”

She did not cry. She did not stop him. She just shrugged coldly and said, “Fine. Goodbye. I never needed you anyway.”

And with that, the Genie vanished like smoke in the wind.

For the first few weeks, she felt victorious. She threw parties. She showed off her money. She spent like there was no tomorrow. She thought she had won the game. But soon, her world started crumbling like a house of cards.

Her company crashed. Profits dropped to zero. Big clients ran away. Employees resigned. Banks refused to help. Without the Genie's invisible hand, her business was nothing but a house of lies. The money dried up faster than water in the desert.

And then — her handsome boyfriend packed his bags. He looked at her with empty eyes and said, “I never loved you. I only loved your money. Now that you are poor, you are worthless to me.” He slammed the door and walked out of her life forever.

She was left alone.

No father. No money. No power. No respect. No boyfriend. No Genie. Just silence and regret.

She sat on the cold floor of her empty palace and cried until her eyes went red. For the first time, she understood the truth. The Genie was never her servant. He was her blessing. He was her guardian angel. He had given her love, protection, and success — not because he had to, but because he truly cared. And she had destroyed it all with her selfishness.

She wished she could go back. She wished she had hugged him. She wished she had thanked him. She wished she had told him that he mattered. She wished she had been kind — just once.

But time does not turn back. Wishes do not come twice. And the Genie was gone — forever.

THE POWERFUL MORAL:

“Some people come into your life like a blessing. But we often realise their value only when they disappear. Love is not a business deal. It is a precious gift. Do not trade it for temporary pleasures. Do not break it for fake people. Because once a true heart leaves, it rarely returns.”

The End.
